Amherst College Law Review

The ACLR seeks to publish thought-provoking submissions focused on the study of law and its relationship to the humanities. This means that the subjects of submissions may range beyond traditional understandings of law. For example, we welcome submissions addressing the representation of film in law equally to submissions addressing human rights and international justice. Our publication is dedicated to showcasing the work of only undergraduate students.

We accept submissions on a year-round rolling basis, so there is no upcoming hard deadline. Our website, ACLawReview.com, contains detailed information regarding submission guidelines, as well as our latest issue, published January 2017. All questions should be directed toward ACLawReview@Amherst.edu. We ask that you encourage undergraduate students at your institution to consider submitting to the ACLR.
