The Tri-Co Law Review, Spring 2023

We are reaching out on behalf of the Tri-Co Law Review (Haverford, Bryn Mawr, and Swarthmore Colleges) to the Harvard history department to ask if you would circulate our call for papers to the majors/minors/concentrators in your department.

The Tri-Co Law Review is a medium through which undergraduate student-run legal scholarship can educate the Tri-Co community and the public. The Law Review encourages its authors to embrace a holistic understanding of law. This includes historical and global law as well as the intersections between law and other fields of study. By especially focusing on editing and publishing, the Law Review emphasizes the process and form of legal scholarship in its mission to educate.

Founded in 2016, originally as the Haverford Law Review, we are composed of students within the Tri-Co Consortium and are accepting papers for publication from undergraduate students both in and outside the Consortium. The Law Review seeks to provide a forum for perspectives on issues arising within various fields in and surrounding law, ranging from topics like criminal procedure to legal interpretations of religious texts. By focusing on the editing and publishing of undergraduate scholarship, the Tri-Co Law Review seeks to cultivate those perspectives and to educate the Tri-Co community and the public.

We are currently accepting papers 4-15 pages long through 11:59 PM EST, March 3rd, 2023. Each paper should deal with law/legislation to some extent.
